This bread is made for special festive occasions, and is eaten by cutting a deep hole in the center and pouring brandy in it to be soaked up by the bread. A popular German confection found at most of the delicatessen stores is called marzipan. This is made of almonds, sugar and eggs, and a small square of it, three inches either way and an inch thick, put up in small tin boxes, costs one dollar in this country."

And when a German asks that Queen Victoria's estate has been for his imported goosebread, schinkenwurst, schwartenmagen, zungenwurst, he demands to see the brand and dis trict in which it was put up, and it always follows that his favorite brand betrays the part of Germany he came from. There are also food products from Spain, Italy and France, which are enumerated and described by Mr.

"More recently the Japanese and Chinese dishes have been imported into this country and the natives living in our large cities are plentifully supplied with their favorite foods. From Japan comes a great variety of devilfish food, put up in many forms, dried, shredded and cauned, almost the same as our codfish. Then there are Japanese tree and sea mushrooms, the former looking somewhat like our field mushrooms, but very woody in taste, and the latter producing nothing much more than glue when boiled. sticky glue or gelatin-like stuff of the sea mushrooms is used as the foundation for soups. The Japanese dry almost every kind of fish found in the waters bordering the island kingdom. and we have them here in sizes from the minnows to swordfishes and devilfishes, large enough to supply a small regiment of soldiers with a day's ra-tions. Clams, mussels, oysters, prawns, ahrimps and crawfish are dried by the Japanese and sold as savory food. They are dried and preserved so that they will last almost ind-finitely in any elimate, but at the same time so thoroughly that there is little juste te them. They suggest dried wood more than dried food, but the Japanese like them and find nourishment in them. The Chinese are more peculiar in their national dishes than the Japanese."
